FAIR TRADE

You probably know the statistics: whatever you pay for a packet of tea in a supermarket, half goes to the manufacturer, a third to the supermarket itself, ten per cent to the plantation where the tea was grown, and about seven per cent to the worker who picked the leaves in the first place.

For a long time, people have recognized that this situation is unfair, and in the last ten years the fair trade movement has managed to provide a real alternative. Fair trade organizations do business directly with producers in the developing world, taking out the middlemen and consequently making sure that the maximum profit returns directly to the producers.

Fair trade also guarantees stability for producers, protecting them against flux in the market through secure, long-term prices and premiums over and above the market rate. Many schemes also offer prepayment or access to credit.

Public opinion surveys repeatedly indicate that people are happy to spend extra for fairly traded goods; Café Direct, the first product to carry the Fairtrade Mark in Britain, is now the third best-selling coffee in one supermarket chain.

Apart from the fair trade organizations themselves, there is a growing demand for other trading companies to adopt more ethical policies towards their own suppliers. Britain's new Ethical Trading Initiative already has the support of five of the country's top ten supermarket chains. More and more often, consumers are asking questions about the working conditions of the people who make the products they buy. Pressing companies for answers about working standards sends a strong signal that consumers are serious about denouncing sweatshop conditions, child labour and workers' rights.
